

This stimulating, true life story chugs on and on, picking up speed with every year

There's no stopping a farm boy on the loose. Yesterdays are very important, but now the Tomorrows are getting his attention.

He's helped hundreds of boys get an education, via the Rotary Foundation scholarship plans and some of his own private philanthropies.

Another angle to this business of education. He's just completed, in December, 1974, a 12 week intensive Bible course at Oral Roberts University, taught by the president himself, Oral Roberts. He's gone back to school, there's always much, much more to learn.

In 1974, the Tulsa Abstract and Title Co. opened a branch office at 6019 S. Sheridan, Tulsa. It is manned by his former baseball playing buddy at Central High (lo, these many eons ago) Harley Aitkin, who was captain of the baseball team and quarterback and manager of the Central football team.

Throughout a mile-a-minute lifetime, Abstractor Bailey never has missed a bet to let the world know of his firm's services.

In 1974, he planted young trees along the curbs of his downtown offices. The newspapers plugged the story with pictures and copy. He has purchased television time on Tulsa stations to tell the story of one day service along with pictures of his service oriented staff.

Free distribution of football schedules of all United State college and pro teams are part of his continuing community service each fall. Included in the little extras are his occasional flashing and donating of a now scarce $2 bill, or handing an unsuspecting friend a tiny show shine magic cloth.

Even with 56 consecutive years of abstracting under his belt, the company president isn't looking for a rocking chair.

Rather, he's scouring the environs, looking for more and more places to get new business, and to give preferred service.

A series of informal dinners for businessmen – from 10 to 20 at a setting – just now has some of the key mortgage bankers, the top savings and loan people, the most astute bankers, the watchful title attorneys, the builders and contractors and the real estate leaders talking.

There's never any stopping, no slowing down, when you've been fortunate enough to brush shoulders with him in workaday paths or been inoculated by that restless, challenging, refreshing, inborn, effervescent Larkin Bailey charge. It's a shot in the arm his very presence instills in others, zeal enough to last a lifetime.
